-J.K. This invention relates to a method of enhancing resin impregnation of electrical conductors, and more particularly, to a method of enhancing resin impregnation of solid dielectric (e.g., "polyurethane-type") films. In the prior art, solid dielectric films have been used to provide dielectric properties between a pair of bonded components, such as a power cable and a cabinet. In one such prior art cable, a solid dielectric film is used to contain a heating medium during the curing of a resin composition, such as a thermoset adhesive or a thermoplastic adhesive, which electrically insulates the cable from the metal conductor therein. The dielectric film is co-extruded during the manufacture of the cable in the prior art. In another prior art cable, a solid dielectric film is used to contain an electrically conductive material therein to provide shielding against electromagnetic interference. The conductive material in the prior art cable is placed in the film by a back-side injection technique. The solids containing the conductive material are mixed with a binder and formed into a film. The film is then co-extruded on a plastic conductor. In both of the foregoing prior art cables, the temperature and pressure during the co-extrusion step is relatively low, usually lower than 350.degree. F. and up to 300 p.s.i. Because
