The people who run the Daily Beast don't want you to be scared. They are not sadists. They are just very, very scared. Every day, this chipper, cheerful, safety-first website invents a new way to make their readers feel better about the world. The front page of the Daily Beast today is devoted to "Fearless Science." The goal of the project is to encourage kids to try more science, and to help them believe that science isn't just about numbers and equations, but is also about solving problems. The headline, "Get a Little Scared," is accompanied by two heartwarming illustrations of a doe-eyed girl who is learning about the Earth's orbit, and a rabbit who comes face-to-face with a rattlesnake. It's impossible to deny that these heartwarming stories of scientific discovery are remarkable, inspiring, and deeply comforting. The problem is that they are only true in the world of the media. In the real world, science is about learning how to solve problems. Science isn't about discovering and explaining the universe. Science is about making better, more effective stuff. It's about making sure that the "stuff" we use is safe, and that it works. If you read the article, you'll see that the "heartwarming" stories of scientific discovery are more terrifying than the "scariest thing on the internet." They are certainly much, much less funny. The first example of "Fearless Science" is called "

Reproducibility of the single-channel data and functional characterization of normal and muscarinic acetylcholine receptors. The reproducibility of the whole-cell single-channel measurements was determined in an isotonic 1-M KCl solution. The reproducibility of the total single-channel amplitude (i.e., the sum of the amplitudes from all recorded channels) was found to be good (CV = 6.7%), while the reproducibility of the channel number, the open probability, and the open time was poor (CV's > 20%). The increase in the channel number observed in experiments on membrane patches from multiple cells can be explained by a simple fusion of the channels in the patch-clamp pipette. The homogeneity of the channel gating was tested by comparing the amplitudes of the observed changes in the open probability of the channel. Using this approach, the noise amplitude of the channel and the changes in the open probability during all-or-none transitions were shown to be equivalent. The functional characterization of the muscarinic acetylcholine receptors in the rat neocortex and the guinea pig ileum was done using a single-channel kinetic approach. The apparent affinity of the receptors was found to be 27 ± 5 microM and 10.8 ± 1.6 microM, respectively, and the dissociation rate constants were 0.61 ± 0.02 s⁻¹ and 0.35 ± 0.04 s⁻¹. The number of open states for the receptors was found to be 1.4 ± 0.5 for the neocortex and 2.8 ± 0
