The comments (and speculation about them) are a graphic illustration of why international journalists must be very careful in the way they relate events on the international news front. No argument from us. We don't agree with that approach either. But there is always an effort to try to pull everything into the international arena. I get every bit as fed up as you do with reading about the political ambition of politicians in every nook and cranny of the world. I get every bit as fed up as you do with reading about the political ambition of politicians in every nook and cranny of the world. I don't like it. I don't like it at all. It is part of a worldwide trend, a creation of the modern media, to position everything. But the annoying thing about this is that it gives the impression that countries don't do anything of their own. They are all seen as pieces on a board with countries pushing around the pieces. I don't like it. I don't like it at all. It is part of a worldwide trend, a creation of the modern media, to position everything. That is a danger. There is a danger that we will no longer recognise countries. There is a danger that we will no longer recognise countries. And that is
