Phosphatidylcholine and low-density lipoprotein metabolism in chronic renal failure. The metabolic fate of [3H]phosphatidylcholine was studied in plasma and plasma lipoproteins in 5 patients with chronic renal failure treated by continuous ambulatory peritoneal dialysis (CAPD), and in 11 healthy subjects, both on a regular diet. The total clearance of [3H]phosphatidylcholine was significantly increased in the patients with chronic renal failure as compared to the control subjects, and there was a significant positive correlation between the total clearance of [3H]phosphatidylcholine and the serum cholesterol level, as well as a significant negative correlation between the total clearance of [3H]phosphatidylcholine and the total plasma protein. The excreted [3H]phosphatidylcholine in the dialysate was significantly increased, when compared with the plasma level, indicating the presence of a net transfer of phosphatidylcholine between plasma and peritoneal cavity. The composition of the plasma and the lipoprotein [3H]phosphatidylcholine was similar in the patients and controls. The mean plasma radioactivity after 60 min was 2.36% in the patients and 2.17% in the control subjects, while after 120 min it was 3.39% in the former and 2.94% in the latter. In the plasma, radioactivity was mainly in the phosphatidylcholine fraction and less in phosphatidylethanolamine, sphingomyelin, and triglyceride fractions. In the lipoprotein fraction, radioactivity was found mainly in the triacylglycerol and cholesteryl ester fractions. No difference between the patients and controls in the composition of these fractions, in the radioactivity per g protein, or in the per cent distribution of [3H]phosphatidylcholine in each fraction was observed.<sup>45</sup>], physicians, and pharmacists \[[@B46]\] that can be used to help with treatment adherence \[[@B
