I very much like the idea of the originator of this new offering. Adobe CS6 is moving on to the Cloud for easier access. From what the early versions will show, not only does Adobe want to make the transition from desktop to cloud, but also a transition from using the current iteration of an application for the duration of its life. With Photoshop CC you get 1GB of Cloud storage. Working with the mobile Web App is more complicated than with the desktop desktop version, but not all features are available in the mobile version yet. There is also a lot of work ahead of Photoshop CC to make it shine and not the equal of CS6 in the market. In the customer review on amazon it looks impressive though. The good news is you should be able to find version updates from the cloud right away. The bad news is you may need to wait a bit for a point release to take the application to the next level. The bad news is you may need to wait for a lot of the usual updates to get the application to the point where it is competitive. The good news is you may be able to offer customers the business versions of the program for life in exchange for starting a CC subscription and using the cloud. Time will tell. Even if not, I think it is time to look at the fact that the desktop applications are becoming relics. What we are seeing in the way of this movement is that many traditional desktop applications are moving toward the cloud. I expect this to be the case for the desktop world.

All your devices will automatically upload your latest photos to Google Photos. The clever app tells you when a photo's new and when the photo's been updated on a device, so you always stay up-to-date with what has changed an upload your latest photos to Google Photos. And you can also view what has been updated on your other devices, in real-time. One of the biggest issues with the old Google Storages was the loneliness and separation of your photos. With Google Photos, you can now share your photos with your friends and family–who happen to be on all your other devices too. And they won't get a bunch of sketchy photos or private content either. Because all your photos are in the cloud, they're automatically encrypted. You can also see photos that don't have a Google account attached to them–either because you don't use Google Photos, or because the person has never uploaded their photos to Google. All photos are private until you share them with others. As you can see from the above roadmap, Adobe's Photoshop and Elements set of products is looking quite promising. But until it arrives on the macOS platform, and if you are Power PC Mac owner like myself, there is a chance that you will not get it very soon. Apple likes to confuse its users and is notorious for not updating its older Mac hardware. This is especially true for the MacBook Air, MacBook, and MacBook Pro. The iMac, MacBook Pro, and Mac Pro are more well-endowed OS-wise, and they are the ones that will get the Photoshop on the web update.
