A list of changes in Photoshop Elements 20 is available here. I deeply appreciate the change in the size of the toolbars. I've never been a fan of large toolbars, and Elements 20 worked out really well. It also presents image preview space on all screen sizes. For the longest time, I used Photoshop 5.0, and I apologize for the fact that I never mentioned it in my earlier review. The previous version of Photoshop Elements was only partially updated when it merged with Photoshop 5.0. Elements 20 has far less open space between toolbars than in previous versions. It has been enough for me and I've not regretted the change. I don't know what the case is with previous versions, but Elements was a lot wider. One of the biggest improvements to the user interface is that people familiar with Adobe's other applications will recognize pretty much everything. The layers panel is similar to Lightroom and the adjustments panel is similar to Photoshop. It may not seem like a big deal, but it is a huge step forward for the user interface. I love that panels are a universal on whether you're editing on a computer or mobile device. Changes in the Print, Slideshow and Website panels are less noticeable and are overshadowed by that of the New Features panel. Although many of Photoshop's functions are still there (such as an updated Pen tool), they have been reorganized and presented in a better manner. Another major change is the rationalization of the various panels. As I mentioned earlier, almost all Photoshop functions are available from the main screen regardless of its location. Layers, adjustments, colors and even paths are shared between each application. Indeed, this is the most impressive change of all.
