Your help would be appreciated I have downloaded the installer for the product, and it was working fine, until the latest version, which is supposed to be 1.07. I am using Windows 7 Professional. The error I'm getting is: The application was unable to start correctly (0xc000007b). Click on OK to close the application. I get this error about every time I open the program. I've tried reinstalling the program, as well as the latest version, but I still get the same error. Has anyone else experienced this problem? A: You need the WxCopy version for Windows 7, but you have Windows 7 Ultimate. Try downloading the version from this page: Lalpur Lalpur or Lal Pahari is a village in the Ludhiana West tehsil, of Ludhiana district, Punjab. WXcopy is small and useful plugin for the Windows Explorer. You can copy by a mouse-click whole partitions, including locked files. Synchronize directories, files or copy directories including ACL (rights). WXcopy does this job for you simply by a drag & drop function. Test it now. Keyboard macros add a new set of commands to the available menu commands in the Windows Explorer context menu. The macros, which are mapped to key combinations, are defined by the KeyMacro.config file. In contrast to custom menus, macros can't be assigned a shortcut in the Start menu context menu, but may be mapped to a key combination in the Run box. In addition to the command mapping, KeyMacro also includes a configurable status bar with key and mouse status messages. In KeyMacro, macros are not represented as menu items. Instead, each macro is represented by a new top-level menu command. The command is associated with a Keyboard Macro entry. The Macro menu commands are command lines that use standard Windows commands and syntax. This means that you can use arbitrary scripts and batch files. You can attach a command to a macro by right-clicking the menu command and selecting "Bind Macro Command". Macro definitions are specified in `KeyMacro.config` and are split into two sections: The left-hand section contains the name of the macro and a set of instructions that is used to evaluate and invoke the macro. The right-hand section contains a key mapping. This allows you to customize the command mapping for each macro. This command line is associated with a Macro entry in the context menu. After having selected the macro, it will be bound to the corresponding key combination. Macro entries are linked to one or more macros. Selecting the macro entry will invoke the macro with the assigned parameters. The macro parameters can be either string parameters or integers or a mixture of both. Strings are the main parameter type. The remainder of the parameters are extracted from the command line and placed in special variables. The following symbols can be used as macro parameters: `%s` receives a string as the first parameter. The macro is invoked with the string and the remaining parameters are extracted from the command line. The `%n` receives an integer parameter as its first parameter. The remainder of the parameters are extracted from the command line and placed in the special variable `%n`. The `%t` receives an integer parameter as its first parameter. The remainder of 2edc1e01e8

1.2.1.2: fixed some errors Please, don't forget to rate! (C) 2005-2012, T. Boehmer Q: Passing array to function inside loop I have a requirement to pass different number of arrays to a function. When i do it as static array i get the expected result. But when I pass the array inside loop i get only last array result. Here is my code

static int array[3] = {4,5,6}; static int array2[3]; static int array3[3]; int* m; void test() { printf("%d,%d,%d ",(m+0),(m+1),(m+2)); } void f(int array) { printf("%d,%d,%d ",(m+0),(m+1),*(m+2)); } int main() { m = &array; for(int i = 0; i < 3; i++) { array2[i] = array[i] * 2; array3[i] = array[i] * 3; test(); } f(array2); return 0; }

When I run this I get output as 4,5,6 4,4,4 4,4,4 Why is this so? Is this because array is static? If so how can I solve this? A:
