Uninstalling Adobe Photoshop is also relatively easy and can be done in a few simple steps. First, go to the Adobe website and locate the uninstall.exe file for the version of Photoshop that you want to delete. Once you have the installation file, open it and follow the on-screen instructions. If the uninstall process does not automatically start you might need to use the control panel. Once the uninstall is complete, you need to delete the software and all of the files and folders associated with the program. This can be done from the control panel. Once the Adobe Photoshop uninstall is complete, you should remove your personal files and folders. And that's it - your Adobe Photoshop is completely removed!

Due to the large number of photos in my library, sorting by location or date is very slow when importing directly from an external drive. When using the import from a folder, I can navigate directly to my source location and do a fast search and replace for all my images there (using a text editor if I really wanted to) and have all my selected images ready to be associated with metadata and sorted into separate folders. This works well until I try to delete the images from the external drive and re-import them. As I delete them, it takes a long time (it's only about ~ 30 images, but it takes a long time) for thousands of photos to re-imported to the folder. If I use the transfer option, rather than the import from folder option, the process takes a long time as my catalog file needs to be downloaded from the network and replaced with the files on my computer. It does speed up the process when I ignore everything except the metadata while importing – in this case, the entire process is almost instantaneous. The new crop tool, featured in the video that's embedded at the top of this page, can be a very powerful tool, as it provides what I believe is the best way to edit images right now. It's sure to help when you need to do complex image edits. One of my good friend's mother suffered an injury that left her blind. She decided that she wanted her next major surgery to be a bilateral cataract surgery, and she found the best physician for the job through Lightroom.
