Adobe Photoshop has impressed me with its robustness, tonality and performance, but the same can't be said of its BPR. After an early, rushed rollout to beta, the BPR was disappointedly removed from the betas only to reappear in today's release. Complaints about the BPR include that it is wholly misleading and obstructive in design. The BPR points to the original version of an image in order to generate a slew of adjacent pages that highlight the differences between the original and your version. Unfortunately Adobe's website states that users can't disable this feature. I like the idea of having that option, but it's still not a feature that should be hindered by an automated layout. But I'm not much of a color guy. Photoshop is a great, vastly-utilized graphics application, but sometimes I'd really rather use a different application. After using it for so many years to create high-quality photographs, it's not surprising that photographers quickly wrap themselves up in a blanket of technical joy, losing sight of the more basic, end-user benefits of their software. And Photoshop boasts numerous features that fall into this camp. For instance, the Drop Zone screen lets you see both the the damage that's been done to your image, and the corrections you've made after performing corrections to the image. This has made my life easier. Now, I said all of that to state the obvious: Photoshop has an interface that is built with the "on-demand" artist in mind. If it's not too much of a delight to learn, it's a great way to make the industry's most-used tool accessible to everyone.
