The hand of 'Buddhism' can be seen in the founding of the Royal Navy, which was popularly believed to have saved England from the French when the were again threatening invasion during the Seven Years War. Many of the first officers were Protestant of the Church of England, but others had a mixed faith and some were Orthodox. The Royal Navy was clearly a bridge between civilised secular and religious society, for on the one hand it was the Christian church that founded and directed it and on the other it was a bulwark against threats from the Devil. The Royal Navy's first captain, Charles Wager, was appointed in 1771 and appointed by George III, at twenty-six years old, as commander-inchief of the Royal Navy and Admiral of the Fleet in North America. At that time there was no navy in North America and the King expected him to curb the outrageous behaviour of the American settlers, especially the Americans' drunkenness and 'freedom of information'. In fact Wager was willing to ignore the settlers' freedoms, he wanted a fleet of two hundred and forty ships and he used this fleet to establish an imperial policy, underwritten by the belief that the British Empire was the centre of moral gravity for the 'civilised' world. On the other hand, the British settlers took to drink, in part as the consequences of the frontier-like lifestyle, as they had no prohibition or civic authority to check their alcohol consumption. A poignant example of this tension between civilised and uncivilised society is the famous case of the Peregrine. This ship could only carry 523 passengers and yet was worth over £200,000 in cargo; she was made of teak, mahogany and rosewood, painted white, and even had public ballrooms, rows of small 'sitting rooms' and gold and crystal chandeliers. She was built by slaves, for slaves, between the 7th and 10th years of the 19th century. In 1920, the ship was traded in a piece; it was bought by the Hobart Steam Navigation Company and in 1929, British Transport
