I can't help but think about the difference between an image entered into the camera and one that is imported into a photo editor. The first image is captured with the lightest color settings possible for the camera. A RAW image file is a warm black and white image that is recorded for immediate post-capture editing. Most DSLR cameras will display a Histogram in the viewfinder or LCD screen, which is very useful in choosing the proper white balance settings for a high dynamic range image. These are the settings you should have using the D800 for landscape photos: ISO 100, f/8, 1/400 sec. and the aperture is set to the widest opening available on the lens. Lights are set to manual levels, > 2 stops above EV. This setting, plus the iso, aperture, and shutter speeds above, produce a very grainy image. I had no clue on how to enhance this image. Would it be worth the time to throw it in ACR? Would it be useful? Would I want to do this? Will I, after the work is done, like the look of the image? What to do this? Want to make it right, this and those questions racing through my head. Eventually I started guessing what might give me that "right" look. To be honest, I only pair the image up with a color profile. As much as I like digital imaging, I find that there's still a step missing between being a photographer and being an artist. I miss that missing layer where you can touch the image and make deep changes to it. It's weird, I know, but I'd love to be able to take the image back to Photoshop and get the exact look that satisfied me. That's hard to achieve in real time, though. The reason being that I have to look at the subject and think about where I want to place light and what I want the image to look like. If it's too strong, I have no problem overcompensating. We've come a long way, though… And I know almost everything someone is looking for in a color profile. All that is left is making a color profile for the image that we're working on. Color Management allows us to change the image and every color, hue, and color temperature involved in it, simply by changing our clients and devices.

I told him about the domain niche space, because it seems to me that there's a lot of things he can work on and have more chance to succeed if he found a way to automate a lot of tasks in the mechanics and race against giants.Or maybe he just overestimates the benefits he could gain by creating a automation service, he wants to build it without thinking of the trade-offs?What could be an alternative to an ajax-snippet, to a freelance digital agency that provides very basic features and a lot of growth hacking? He doesn't want to start a agency, but rather a service he can easily scale. ====== Swizec You know how most people who like watching documentaries are tech-savvy? Same goes for people who like watching deleted scenes. I personally have a friend who likes watching deleted scenes. He's very much not tech-savvy. I asked him why? He said "Well, because they're free!" So he logs on to YouTube, finds the deleted scene he likes, logs out, and starts to watch. Now here's the thing: What if his VPS or whatever he uses to watch is compromised and an attacker sees him watching deleted scenes? If however, I log into his VPS and watch one of the deleted scenes for him, well, he has no reason to care that I'm on his VPS running some software with remote code execution. ------ arnv The concessions the friend is looking for is called growth hacking. This is where startups copy the tactics of successful companies, change things slightly and hook them up to their own idea, so that they can get traction. For instance I would say sending out massive amount of 60-70k unsolicited emails is a great idea for a web app that's pretending to be a marketing (or at least sales) tool. Another example would be to leverage referrals. The partner might be suffering from sending out tons of blank emails telling people how his app is the best thing since sliced bread.

The same image with the same settings can have different results depending on the color space used at the time of editing. The three most commonly used color spaces are RGB (red, green & blue), CMYK (cyan, magenta, yellow & black), and grayscale (greyscale). You can choose to edit with one of these color spaces or you can leave the color space at the default setting, which is sRGB. If you choose to edit with the default setting, your changes will only apply to other files that use the same default color space.
